Apartheid's legacy two-speed economy, and the fault lines exposed by COVID-19, has shone a light on South Africa's food security, inequality and unemployment challenges.

The University of Cape Town will host former head of investment banking for sub-Saharan Africa at Goldman Sachs and senior fellow and lecturer at Yale University's Jackson Institute for Global Affairs, Colin Coleman, who will present a lecture titled "From a two-speed economy to one for all South Africans".

Coleman is available for interviews this evening after the speech and tomorrow morning. If you would like to interview him please email Nombuso.shabalala@uct.ac.za or Aamirah.sonday@uct.ac.za.

His speech is also available online and is strictly embargoed for delivery at 18:00, 15 July 2020.

Coleman was born in South Africa and in the 1980s, was involved in the anti-apartheid movement and later its constitutional transition as an executive director for the Consultative Business Movement.

He is the recipient of various accolades and continues to co-chair the Youth Employment Service. Coleman is also a member of the Steering Committee of the CEO Initiative in South Africa, senior advisor to the Eurasia Group, and a non-executive member of the Board of The Foschini Group.
